PERSONALITIES I HAVE MET—MARIE DORO.

"ALL the world loves a lover!" The old adage certainly went for truth when it was whispered in the famous Players' studio that a rose-colored romance was winging its way around the studio like a butterfly that sought the candle flame. Two hearts were beating sympathetically—too fast—and a hundred and two tongues were wagging with entirely too much abandon! But it's fun to gossip, especially when you are gossiping about the other fellow's romance!

The Garrulous Informer would not tell us at first who the guilty parties were, so one by one we suspected the petite little Marguerite Clark, the golden-haired Hazel Dawn, and the beautiful Pauline Frederick.

"You are all wrong," the G. I. told us the following afternoon, whispering it to us, making the ten of us swear we would never breathe it to a soul, knowing very well that we would lose no time telling it to every one we knew. "It's Marie Doro and Elliot Dexter!"

"Fiddlesticks!" And ten fingers were snapped at once. "Why, we have known that for weeks and weeks, watching it from a tiny little bud of a romance until now we are quite confident the bloom is full and wedding bells will be echoing through the studio."

"I have seen them together often," remarked one of the little gossips, "and one afternoon, when they were having tea, she looked so blushing and lovely, her pink face half hidden by a large rose-colored hat. He was leaning over so close to her and seemed so interested in all she was saying! I was sure then they must be in love and that the love scenes they played in the make-believe pictures were happily sincere."

"I notice that after he leaves the scene, instead of going to his dressing-room or standing about chatting with the other girls, he never takes his eyes off Marie Doro, who is a pretty good sign he is in love," came from another little volunteer gossip.

"Yes, and he even went so far," a third wagging tongue chimed in, "as to remark to some one that he thought her the most beautiful woman in the world—which isn't so far from being true," the little actress added.

Just then an embarrassed silence settled upon us, because the much discussed and romantic Marie Doro was coming out of her dressing-room. She stopped for a few minutes to talk to her director, and then she passed us, smiling very knowingly as if she surmised what we were whispering about.

"Isn't she beautiful?" we echoed in a chorus, our eyes following her and studying this rhythm of her figure. She was in a white Japanese kimono, with her dark brown hair tumbling about her shoulders, for it was during the taking of "The White Pearl." As she entered the scene and stood against a black velvet background, she was indeed a strangely luminous and beautiful figure.

Our prophecy came true, for not many days afterward the engagement was announced and then the wedding followed, which was one of the social events of the season. At present the happy couple are out in California, making a picture for the Lasky Producing Company, and the critics hint, ever so wisely, at a new tenderness in Marie Doro's eyes and a sweetness and charm which are ineffably the afterglow of a great love.

It was with much interest that we watched Marie Doro after she left the stage to come to the famous Players' studio during the taking of her first picture, "The Morals of Marcus." We had always thought her beautiful on the stage, but she was even more lustrous at close range, with her great, somber eyes through which surged dormant fires; her white, shell-like skin, with her dark hair coiled simply at the nape of her neck in keen contrast to the flesh tones.

She has a merry little laugh and seems more at home in pictures than most stage stars do, who find it necessary to get accustomed to the lights and the lack of applause, and miss the long-time rehearsals before the actual producing of the play.

Mrs. K. P.—I regret I did not receive your letters sooner. They must have gone astray in my large mail bag. Your little girl, Dorothy, was a little dear. Several who saw the picture thought there was a resemblance to my early pictures.

A. J.—The verses were very beautiful and I wish to thank you for your kindness in writing them for me. I shall put them in my scrapbook.

Toward noon of a fine day Puss Junior halted his good gray horse near a meadow. Standing near the fence sharpening his scythe stood a young farmer. His wide straw hat kept off the sun and his loose shirt and open collar let in the breeze which was blowing across the green grass.

"Warm day," said Puss as he drew rein. "Well," replied the farmer, "it's not so bad. I don't feel it." And he commenced to sing.

"My maid Mary she minds the dairy, While I go a-hoeing and mowing each morn. Gaily run the reel and the little spinning wheel, Whilst I am singing and mowing my corn."

"Are farmers always so happy," asked Puss when the man stopped singing. The farmer smiled and said: "My good son, when one is blessed with a fine wife and a good farm he can beat a canary bird at singing."

"Oh, pshaw!" cried Puss, sitting down on the log.

"You don't say so?" said Puss Junior. "But suppose one has neither, what should such an unlucky one do?"

"Don't ask me," said the farmer, setting to work again. "I'm a simple man and what is happiness for me might be for another."

As he swung his scythe back and forth the tall grass fell in graceful rows and the sweet scent of the new mown hay was everywhere. Suddenly Puss saw a field mouse scampering over the ground. This was too much for Puss. He had eaten nothing since breakfast and he had not had a mouse to eat for so long that he had almost forgotten how mice tasted. Jumping down from his good gray horse he gave chase.

"Go it, Sir Cat!" cried the farmer, "don't lose him!"

Puss needed no words of encouragement. He lunged for a good run and smoothly fairly watered at the idea of a nice fat little mouse for lunch. But the field mouse saw him coming and wasted no time. Away he went, hopping over the grass and looking wildly about for a place in which to hide. A trunk of a fallen tree at no great distance attracted his attention, and with a final burst of speed he reached it and

PLANET OBSCURED EARLY THIS MORNING

It was announced by the Naval Observatory that Saturn would, and we take it for granted that he did, pass behind the moon at an early hour this morning. The schedule was that the bright morning star, which in fact is not a star at all but a planet with a disk around it which resembles a race track when viewed through a telescope, was to disappear behind the moon at 2:11 o'clock and remain obscured for one hour and two minutes.

This occurs, the astronomers tell us, every eight or ten years.

SHIELDS BILL WAITS TILL NEXT SESSION

Senate and House conferees of the Shields water power bill, decided yesterday there was no hope of coming to agreement on the points at issue between the two Houses of Congress and the legislation will go over until the next session.

Conservationists have fought the bill bitterly, claiming that it gives away to the private water power companies natural rights of immense value. The bill passed the Senate early in the session, but when it reached the House it was almost entirely rewritten.

80 TEMPORARY CLERKS JOIN PERMANENT ROLL

Executive Order Gives State Department Services of Experienced Employees.

Eighty temporary employees of the State Department were placed on the permanent roll on May 13 by executive order, according to information furnished to the Senate late yesterday by President Wilson, in response to the Penrose resolution recently passed.

These employees, according to Secretary of State Lansing, had from six to twenty months' experience as temporary employees of the department, and because of this knowledge of the work required were more desirable than those available by recourse to the Civil Service lists.

From August 1, 1914, to July 1, 1916, 153 temporary employees were hired by the State Department. The additional force was made necessary by the tremendous amount of detail work forced on the department by the European war. Because of the necessity of getting these employees without delay, the Washington business colleges and the registry lists of the large typewriter exchanges were drawn upon rather than the classified lists of the Civil Service.

From July 1, 1912, to June 30, 1916, seventy-six appointments were made in the department, of which seventy were from the Civil Service lists, two by Civil Service recommendation and four by executive order.

Under the new legislative, executive and judicial appropriation bill, ninety-four new employees were authorized, and it was in providing for these new positions that Secretary Lansing requested permission to take over the temporary employees, which request President Wilson granted.

Many of these witnesses would be willing to return to this city to aid the District Attorney's office, Mr. Smith said, but for the fact that they have been threatened.

FEAR INVASION; FIND TROOPS REHEARSING

Soldiers at Camp Ordway Rush to Scene of Firing and Discover 'Thrilling Rescue' Practiced.

Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang! Five shots rang out near the cavalry camp at Camp Ordway yesterday afternoon. The infantrymen on the hill to the south, rushed out and strained their eyes to see what was the matter. Was it another civilian attack on the camp, or was a prisoner trying to escape?

A horse was dashed across the field. A man was snatched from the ground and swung upon the flying horse. The rescued man pulled a revolver from a holster, and five quick shots were fired into the air.

Then the infantrymen realized that it was all a part of the universal practicing for the field day exercises that will raise money for the National Guard "swallow" tomorrow afternoon.

The wooden wall in the infantry camp was scaled many times during the day by the provision company of the Third Battalion. Several sprained wrists were reported as a result of the vigorous exercise.

The companies from the other two battalions practiced bayonet exercises and built a manual to the music of "Swallow" tomorrow afternoon.

Plans are being completed for the tea dance that is to follow the field day. This social benefit function will be in the administration building at Fort Myer, beginning at 8:30 o'clock. The field events will begin at 3:30 o'clock in the afternoon.
